"The Hamptons have a long history of modern and innovative structures. There have always been architects looking for ways of creating houses that not only respond to the landscape, but that offer solutions that take maintenance and the elements into account. This house does all of those things. It responds to the needs of durability through the material choices: cement board panels, aluminum doors and windows, and stone floors; and while keeping a fairly private face to the street, it literally embraces the dunes in the back, celebrating the existing topography by emphasizing the landscape and allowing rooms to open up to it."
